One of the Most Important Historical Flutes to be Available in Years The Third French Flute Ever Made Built in 1847 by Boehm, Lot, Godfroy

The story of flutemaking reaches its apogee in the development of the instrument we use today, which occurred in the Paris workshop of Louis Lot and Vincent Hypolite Godfroy. Lot and Godfroy married the bore of Boehm, the clutches of Buffet, the G# key and many other ideas of Dorus, and their own genius in design and mechanics to transform the flute into the instrument of the future. The Godfroy-Lot mechanism was adopted by other makers, starting with Rudall and Rose and eventually Boehm himself, although both these firms altered the basic mechanism with their own ideas. This flute is either Blotfroy #3 (Boehm, Lot and Godfroy), or Lotfroy flute #1 if the tube is French. This instrument was owned by Alexander Murray and studied by Arthur Benade in the 1970s. Including this flute, there are only five flutes known today which we feel are certain to have been made and finished in Paris during the first two years after Boehms patent of 1847.
